

In Dec. 1966 I came home from the hospital with my 1st child, my sister who was 7 came to visit, the next day she came down with measles. I immediately took my baby to my pediatrician, he said it was no big deal, measles was just a virus and that my baby would run a fever and get a rash, which he did. If it was no big deal then, why is it such a big deal now? Is it because pharmaceuticals weren't so hell bent on making big bucks back then? It was normal then to get measles it was a part of childhood not the big monstrous thing that it is being labeled as. Almost everyone I knew and their children had measles, I never heard of anyone child or adult dying from it.
